RESEARCH PROFILE

My main research hitherto critically explores monetary theory and policy and their macroeconomic applications and significance, with particular regard to environmental and social components. Rooted in the critique of political economy, I have a sound knowledge of the authors and theories of the past, to which I aim to impart a fresh interpretation attuned to the current state of the world. The insights gained outside my core curriculum – particularly in the fields of philosophy, physics, and psychology – enrichen my economic analysis while opening up new interdisciplinary avenues, as yet partly uncharted.
